Problem Statement - College students often struggle with time management, which often leads to stress. On top of this, unforeseen problems arise from financial struggles, a lack of outside help from university offices for handling these issues, and a variety of small, fixable problems across campus that contribute to the growing issue of student stress.

Who is affected? - All students across campus who may have financial struggles or a lack of outside help are affected by this, but most students on campus are affected by some sort of stress.

What is the problem? - A lack of guidance and resources from campus, unhelpful staff within what are supposed to be aid offices, a lack of parking, a lack of student housing, and a variety of small problems that build up and ultimately cause stress on the student.

Why does this occur? Small issues across campus that build up on top of already existing classes to create stress on the student.

Why does this matter? - These issues can affect a student's grades within classes and contribute to mental health issues for those affected. This might also contribute to a student dropping out due to an inability to deal with a compounding of issues.
